Dear Chanrithy:

I have had time to read your script WHEN BROKEN GLASS FLOATS. You have done a wonderful job of taking your memoir and adapting it into a screenplay. Congratulations. Writing a good script is not an easy task – and writing one about your own life and the very tough circumstances you had to endure is an even bigger challenge. I was totally impressed and proud of the job you did.

I very much like the fact the script has the interesting juxtapositioning of very tough subject matter as told through the eyes of a child with much innocence but also a fighting spirit that would not be denied.

The title is powerful – and I love how it is explained in the script. I think when you send it out for consideration you should also include your website and the Amazon book reviews – as they are very positive and impressive.

This will be a heavier lift than most – not because it isn't good – but because the subject matter is tough (and a period piece) and obviously the casting is such that you will be limited as to star power. If I might suggest... what I would focus on is getting a name director interested and attached – that will help. That is often difficult – but if you can find a director with whom this material resonates it would bring you a step closer in having a strong package to present to a buyer.

You have had a life filled with obstacles beyond what anyone should have to endure – but you have risen to the challenges and have dedicated yourself to telling your story so as to make certain it never happens to others – that is brave and admirable and I am very honored that you have shared your story with me.

I am more than happy to have you send this letter along with your script as an endorsement. Please keep me posted as to your progress. God Bless.

Best – Karen
